Amy Porter, Executive Director & CEO

Amy Porter is the Executive Director/CEO of the National Osteoporosis Foundation (NOF), the leading consumer and community-focused health organization dedicated to prevention of osteoporosis and broken bones, strong bones for life and clinician and public education. Since joining NOF in 2010, she has developed national and regional efforts that address these goals, as well as designing and co-convening the National Bone Health Alliance, a public-private partnership committed to working from a shared vision: improving the overall health and quality of life of all Americans by enhancing their bone health.

Prior to joining NOF, Porter served as Executive Director of the Foundation for the National Institutes of Health (FNIH). During her tenure, Porter led the efforts to bridge industry’s and the government’s mutual interests and investments in biomedical research as exemplified in these FNIH-convened partnerships – the Osteoarthritis Initiative, the Alzheimer’s Disease Neuroimaging Initiative (ADNI), The Biomarkers Consortium and Grand Challenges in Global Health. Under her direction, the FNIH received a prestigious $200 million grant from the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation and the organization grew significantly in annual revenue as well as visibility.

Porter received the NIH Clinical Center Director’s Award in 2005 for her work in establishing the Edmond J. Safra Family Lodge on the NIH campus and the University of Akron’s Honorary Alumni Award in 2008 for career achievements.